This historic book may have numerous typos and missing text. Purchasers can download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1850. Excerpt: ... feel little disposed to change their place of abode for a more civilized habitation. Is it an instinctive attraction, an inexplicable longing for the early home of our race, or the influence of early implanted religious feeling, that draws us to spots where God has so frequently made Himself visible to man, and the footsteps of prophets and saints have consecrated the very soil? CHAPTER XXXI. Journey from Aleppo. Antioch. Latakia. Conclusion. Not far from Aleppo is the town of Scanderoon, situated on the gulf of that name. It is the seaport of the former city, whence merchandise is exported to Europe and other parts, and is frequented by many vessels, though its unhealthiness is such that few persons can reside there for any length of time with impunity. Near this place, lived an Englishman who had embraced the creed of Islam, and was married to three Syrian ladies of the same faith. He was said to be an eccentric individual, and had erected a costly tomb over the remains of a favorite dog. Aleppo seems to be the head quarters of the different Christian churches and sects prevalent in Syria. Maximus, the papal Patriarch of the Syrians, had his residence here. He received his education at Rome, and was considered a man of some ability. The Greek Melekites have a church at Aleppo, and a very fair congregation. We attended service there one Sunday, and could follow it tolerably, having acquired the Greek mode of pronunciation. Only certain parts of the Liturgy, however, were in the Greek language, as the Melekites use the Arabic in their ministrations. The church was not well fitted up, and, as usual, decorated with tawdry pictures. Nor could the chanting be considered agreeable to a European ear. At the end of the Liturgy, certain portions of consecrated b...
