Still relatively neglected in Holocaust literature is the period immediately after liberation. For the survivors, that time was in a particular sense, not liberating at all: with the Jewish communities in Europe decimated, and most towns in ruins, the way home was often blocked or extremely painful. The worst affliction, however, was the intense loneliness of the survivors deprived of their families. They knew, or feared, they had no one left, yet they desperately looked for purpose and community. In The Chocolate Deal, Gouri enters the minds of two such survivors, the last of their families, who wander about aimlessly as they remember the promise of their early years.

Gouri has produced a remarkable book about a time in which time seemed unreal, without direction, and almost unredeemable.
